One of the biggest challenges for us rangers is to communicate and protect the interests of nature without overriding local people, despite their needs.

In my country, rangers need a decent salary so that all our colleagues are well and not run over. Another thing is the lack of equipment and staff for park rangers.

World Ranger Day for me means commemorating all the rangers who have died in their work to protect protected areas. We must stop human intervention in these areas.

For me, World Ranger Day is a day that reminds me of the global dimension of our profession. What connects rangers worldwide is that we see ourselves as part of the nature that needs to be preserved.

World Ranger Day, in my view, is a day dedicated to us being useful to others. This year should be especially about rediscovering the motivation that makes us fight every day.

We rangers do an important and also very dangerous job in some countries. I would love that to be more honoured.

There are only few professional rangers in Slovakia. And those that are there do not have the conditions to do their work. That is why we are working on a new law to solve this.

Having a day to honour my colleagues around the world and our work is hugely important. Even in a rich country like Switzerland, we rangers have to keep fighting for recognition.

I would like to see more recognition also for rangers who do not work in protected areas. Many work tirelessly in urban or suburban areas, on hiking trails, along canals, in commercial forests, with utilities, etc. The work of these rangers is just as vitally important.

What connects us rangers worldwide is the love and dedication to work for something where there is no big lobby yet.

Reinhold Müller Swiss Ranger

World Ranger Day reminds me of the rangers all over the world who face greater challenges every day than I do. I wish them safety!

The recognition of rangers as professionals must be increased. Often decision makes do not understand what it takes to be a ranger and the duties that must be carried out to do the job effectively.
